Connecting systems to achieve net zero objectives

Alain Charles Publishing from Oil Review Middle East Issue 7 2022
by Alain Charles Publishing

Albert Devadasan, EVP – Energy & Sustainability at Yokogawa Middle East & Africa, discusses the company’s hydrogen and decarbonisation initiatives, and how it is helping companies to build smart, sustainable and resilient industrial ecosystems.

What do you think is the potential for hydrogen development in the Middle East?

We can see that global energy transition is being led by countries in the region. Environmental, Social and Governance factors are priorities by not only for Government entities, but for private industries and companies as well. Considering its significant solar energy with very high GHI (Global Horizontal Irradiance), combined with wind resources, countries in the region are aiming at increasing the share of solar and wind power in their electricity generating capacity. While all countries are working towards their net-zero goals, green hydrogen is becoming an increasingly attractive option. There is a large number of green hydrogen/ammonia projects in progress in the region, and therefore, the region is well positioned to be a major supplier of green energy to the world.

With long history and experience in the entire value chain from renewable power production to ammonia production and transportation, Yokogawa will continue to support these initiatives and supply solutions using emerging and future technologies for the development of a truly autonomous operation model.
